ONE YEAR AFTER TRAGEDY

Mystery Still Shrouds Invasion

(Editor's Note — A year ago Tuesday (April 17) 1500 U.S.-armed Cubans tried to invade their homeland and throw out Fidel Castro. Tragedy was the result, and the debacle has toned U.S. relations with Latin America ever since. Following is an article by NANA'S analyst on Latin American affairs, recounting the events leading up to the tragedy and its after effects.)

By VIRGINIA PREWETT

WASHINGTON, (NANA) — In the morning twilight of April 17, 1961, an invasion army of Pigs, was not so fortunate. Frogmen sent ashore as scouts were spotted and fired on by militia guards. The first landing craft were raked with shore-fire, with five casualties. This landing was not successful from the first.

As the invaders from the Gi-ron Beach moved forward to se-cure all points of access to the airport where the revolutionary council was to land, resistance dwindling and [illegible] revolutionary council, which had been kept under wraps by CIA men, beginning on the evening of Saturday, April 15, was not informed of the play-by-play course of the battle. But late on invasion day, they were told in their Florida hideaway that they would not be flown to Cuba, as scheduled.

The Cuban leaders knew something was going wrong.
